

In one line, what do you think Maavie is about after landing on the page?

1. Motherhood related page
2. Post partum mental health and care.
3. the best of personal beauty in a new, scary period in life – pregnancy
4. seems to be nice and appealing
5. Maavie feels like a science-led, emotionally sensitive skin and wellness brand built specifically for women navigating pregnancy, postpartum, and motherhood-related body changes.
6. Skin care range for postpartum based on natural science
7. Natural skincare for women specifically for pregnant/ postpartum phase
8. A wellness brand in first glance, a skincare as we scroll down
9. Definitely skincare brand with herbal ingredients.

Does it feel like this brand is meant for you and your current life stage? (Yes / Maybe / No — why?)

1. Maybe
2. Yes
3. No - I am not pregnant
4. maybe, but its target seems to be pregnant or new moms ..so not sure if this aligns with me
5. No - and that's not a failure, but a positioning choice. As a woman who is not a mother and doesn't plan to be one, I don't see myself reflected as the end user. The brand feels clearly, intentionally designed for mothers, rather than for women across life stages. I can admire it, trust it, even recommend it - but I don't instinctively feel invited in.
6. Maybe. Focus is majorly on females who are undergoing some hormonal transition
7. No only if it's not for pregnant women alone
8. Maybe- it would depend on my trial of the products. I am 40 and wouldn't mind effective skincare that helps with skin tightening and works on the deeper layers of the skin. I will be looking for something non-oily yet moisturising similar to Clinique's Moisture Surge but in better price range, along with a night cream containing retinal or something similar.
9. Yes. I am all about natural and clean stuff for my skin.

What stood out most to you first — visuals, words, or philosophy?

1. Visuals
2. Words
3. Philosophy
4. Philosophy
5. Philosophy first, then words.
6. The belief system around biology, change, and care comes through strongly and feels well thought-out. It signals seriousness and intent. The visuals support this quietly, but they don't overpower. It comes across as a thinking-led brand, not a purely aesthetic one.
7. Visuals - giving impression as if they are related or coming directly from the nature.
8. Visuals
9. Visuals and the "Sciences we draw from" part.
10. Visuals first that were able to convey the philosophy.

Was anything confusing, unclear, or too heavy to read?

1. No
2. No
3. No
4. the picture of the pregnant woman makes it look too centric for audience. Not sure if its meant to be that way, should be something that should resonate with pregnant+moms
5. Nothing is confusing, but parts feel dense and earnest to the point of being heavy. There's a lot of explaining and validating happening upfront. While that builds credibility, it slightly slows momentum. A sharper hierarchy - what I need to know now VS what I can learn later would make the experience feel lighter and more inviting.
6. No
7. No
8. No

After seeing this, would you be curious to try Maavie or join the waitlist? (Yes / Maybe / No)

1. Maybe
2. Maybe
3. Yes
4. Yes
5. Maybe. I'd be curious intellectually and professionally, but as a consumer, I wouldn't feel an immediate personal pull to join unless the brand broadened its narrative beyond motherhood into a more universal conversation about women's bodies over time.
6. Maybe
7. Yes. As it gives a very premium feel
8. Try Maavie - yes
 - * Join the waitlist - yes if I was pregnant
 - It clearly appears to be a pregnancy-centric brand focused on creating safer products for that specific consumer group. As I am not at that stage I am comfortable using products that may include ingredients like tretinoin. However I would definitely recommend and sign up my pregnant friends and cousins for this brand.
